Education and the good life. 319p $2.50 Boni & Liveright [6s Allen & U.]

370.4 Education. Moral education 26-11232

The chapters of the book are in the nature of informal talks to parents on the moral education of their children. These talks treat of such subjects as the inculcation of good habits and the elimination of bad ones, proper relations between parent and child, and when and how to introduce sex education. In a brief concluding section the author considers the later intellectual training of school and university.

RUSSELL, PHILLIPS. Benjamin Franklin, the first civilized American. 332p il $5 Brentano's

B or 92 Franklin, Benjamin 26-18382

Mr. Russell conceives of Benjamin Franklin as "the first civilized American because at an American period eminent for narrowness, superstition, and bleak beliefs he was mirthful, generous, open-minded, learned, tolerant, and humor-loving. Because he was the first American man of the world in the sense that he was the first American world man." His biographer acknowledges that after most diligent search thru the vast Franklin material he was only partly successful in discovering the inner man whom, in spite of his apparent candor, Franklin never revealed to the world. He does succeed, however, in presenting a lively portrait of Franklin—his gaiety and his gusto for living, his common sense and his weakness, his many activities, his platonic love affairs.

"It is not as a scientist, or public servant, or father of our liberties that we receive Franklin through Mr. Russell. It is as a rich personality, and as a wise man who lived with wit and humanity and admirable art. It is to this end that Mr. Russell bent his search for new material. His contributions scarcely justify the belief of the publishers that he has remade the face of a good doctor. But the relaxing of the proprieties in this generation has made possible the publication of more of the robust jokes and jeu d'esprits which still lie in the repositories of Franklin manuscript, and this Mr. Russell has not hesitated to do." "Mr. Russell has written this book in a gayly ironical, somewhat patronizing manner, catching the gusto, slyness and overflowing spirits of Franklin himself. Nothing is extenuated, nothing is set down in malice, nothing is hidden, nothing is praised or condoned. Franklin is shown to us from every angle of his nature and in every act of his career with the blinding vividness of a running series of close-ups in a motion picture. The feat is all the more remarkable in that Mr. Russell does not attempt to 'psychologize' his subject, but achieves through letters, documents, epigrams and pictures of Franklin's exterior life as complete a portrait of his multi-visioned, erratic, contradictory soul as I know of." SANDBURG, CARL. Abraham Lincoln, the prairie years. 2v 480:482p il $10 Harcourt B or 92 Lincoln, Abraham 26-3885

The latest biography of Lincoln is an extraordinarily vivid and detailed account of the first fifty-one years of his life, before he became president. Mr Sandburg himself grew up in that section of the country where the greater part of Lincoln's life was spent and years of loving study of his theme have enabled him to build up the background against which Lincoln moved and the forces that made him. In simple and homely language, at times rising to poetry, he shows Lincoln growing along with the growth of the nation—product and expression of his times and the soil that bore him. There are many illustrations from photographs, as well as letters, maps, cartoons and sketches.

"Carl Sandburg has written his best work in these two thick volumes. In no previous composition has he more completely expressed his own heart. His writing bears every evidence of affection for his task. What he heard about Lincoln in his boyhood in Galesburg, Illinois, and what he has been hearing and reading in the more recent years, have precipitated in these pages in a form that carries its own evidence of sincerity and devotion. And it is pleasant reading." W: E. Barton

The scene of this exquisitely simple story is a little hamlet in the Pyrenees on the border between France and Spain. José, the younger son of the Vicentes family, had married the beautiful Metchita and when he died she had been forced to accept a home for herself and her two children with his older brother. One day her handsome son Miguel kills the cruel uncle who had made their lives miserable, whereupon the unselfish and devoted Venturetta takes upon herself her brother's guilt and goes to prison in his stead. The sympathizing villagers, who had hated her uncle, secure her release, but she is doomed thru her self-renunciation and religious fervor to one misfortune after another. The story ends on a note of quiet happiness when Venturetta is restored to her one-time lover who in his loneliness and poverty appeals to her unselfish love.

And yet, though she surfeits us with his praises, Signora Sarfatti does not succeed in making her hero quite uninteresting. The real man, with his energy, his violent passions, his instability, his immense ambition and his petty vanity, does break through the romantic flummery with which his friend surrounds him. And even the events of his life are not so dull as he himself suggests in his Preface."

"Mr. Sassoon is a poet who has learnt a great deal from having been once a satirist. He was a satirist because there was a thing he hated very much—the War, and another thing, the way in which it was waged. The hatred sharpened his tongue and gave him to say certain poems which will not be forgotten. But the War passed and with it the power of hatred which it had engendered in Mr. Sassoon. Immediately after her secret marriage to Clifford Mary left him, and in the present story she appears as Bradley's accomplice in his schemes of extortion and blackmail. 657 Accounting 26-2904

"The book is intended as a practical guide for superior officers and for employees having to do with the conduct of the internal business operations of a government service. It describes in detail an accounting procedure which is applicable to most of the government bureaus. It includes over sixty forms recommended for the keeping of accounts. Although primarily a technical treatise for government officials, the chapters dealing with 'Principles of Accounting Procedure' and 'Budget Procedure' are of interest to students of administration. The latter chapter gives one of the most satisfactory brief accounts known to the writer of the procedure employed by the national government in the preparation of the budget for presentation to Congress, the procedure followed by Congress in voting funds, and the present system of controlling the expenditures authorized."—Am Pol Sci R

This latest output from an indefatigable pen tells of a polished yet purposeful gentleman from Virginia who at the close of the Civil war bought an enormous tract of land in the center of a troubled Texas region and there created the exact likeness of his plantation home. Mary Fentress went to Berisford for protection, and at the point of his unerring pistol he held her and his home against a dangerous combine of bushwackers, outlaws, and Indians.

"Mr. Seltzer writes rather too readily. His talent does not seem to improve with use. Still he is necessary to us here in America. For he has taken the place of the 'Ten Cent Munro Novel' which flourished forty years ago, side by side with the works of lesser artists in the ten cent craft."

SHARP, EVELYN. Hertha Ayrton, 1854-1923; a memoir. 304p il $5.50 Longmans [15s E. Arnold]

B or 92 Ayrton, Hertha (Marks) (Mrs William Edward Ayrton) 26-13274

This is a story of the life of England's famous woman scientist who, born of humble Jewish parents, rose to prominence in the scientific and literary worlds and numbered among her friends Mme Curie and George Eliot. Indeed, the portrait of Mirah in Daniel Deronda is drawn in part at least from Hertha Marks. After marriage to Professor Ayrton, Hertha Ayrton continued her scientific experiments which culminated during the World war in the Ayrton fan, a device for protection against gas attacks.

"Fascinating to read, though like many important books it does not offer itself easily. To the reader accustomed to the sparkling narrative of various recent biographers, its more staid procedure will suggest a staidness of mind in either writer or subject that the book is far from developing. And yet as one proceeds he finds that the book has rich offerings to bring to that most interesting of all sports, the wary and lynx-eyed tracking of personality, perhaps all the richer because the author's respect for personality, while it debars her from feeling superior, quite as effectively restrains her from making a little tin goddess of her shaggy great woman." A. B. Parsons

+ Books (N Y Herald Tribune) p3 Ag 1 '26 960w

"Hertha Ayrton's friend and biographer reveals her in the light of a long and intimate acquaintance, and hence more clearly than else were possible. And because every line is instinct with a rare understanding of a rare personality and genius, the portrait she presents has an appeal second only to that of life, making known as she should be known, a woman whose life story is one to hearten and inspire women of every race and creed, the wide world over." 792 Theater—Little theater movement. Community plays, etc. 26-11277

Out of his experience in little theatre management Frank Shay has written this practical guide for little theatres, community players, amateur dramatic clubs and other independent producing groups. The book is confined entirely to the business side of the theatre—working organization, duties of officers, selection of plays and payment of royalties, management, financing and advertising.

"The author, who is associated with the Provincetown Barnstormers, has disregarded all alluring side tracks and has gone straight to the first fundamental problem of the venture if it is to succeed—that of constructive management. There is very little reference to art or ideals in the work. This thoroughly practical discussion of financing and managing the undertaking should meet with wide approval."

Nancy who made friends with the gentle little madwoman at "Whispers", and finally it was this same Nancy who won David Lambert's heart and held it.

"Here is a novel which opens with many of May Sinclair's moving picture flashed and ends with smooth, pretty technique a long, long way from its early chapters. It is as if the author had begun with grim intent to be a realist, and finds that in spite of herself she inevitably lapses into good old romanticism.

The main difficulty with her style is that she finds it necessary to soar, and she soars continually."

Turkish life of today in and about Constantinople is pictured by Mrs Sheridan in a series of views which, as the title suggests, change rapidly in setting and color. "Mr. Sherman was always a man of strong feeling, a feeling for life and a feeling for literature in general. It was this that carried him over his morass; it is this that makes him today the most interesting figure in American criticism. In his newly awakened sympathy with the modern world he has become a sort of impressionist of character. But he seems to be destined for a third incarnation. He is the only critic in America to-day who writes of the past and the present with equal relish. Of the past he writes with relish and authority. Is he going to be able to command the modern Hèrédia, Leconte de Lisle and Sully Prudhomme. The section which follows is by far the largest; here he renders the Symbolists and their followers as well as a few important poets who were neither. The last brief section is given over to Dadaists and Super-realists."—Books (N Y Herald Tribune)

"Mr. Shipley's volume is the first attempt, in English, to survey the whole field of modern French poetry. The choice of authors is excellent. . . His translations are never very accurate. There is a very useful dictionary—'Le Nouveau Petit Larousse.' Probably Mr. Shipley owns and employs a copy. In the final chapter there is an estimate of the influence of Tillman on his State after he became United States Senator and after his death. One chapter of the book is devoted to a subject which is of peculiar interest at this time—the famous Tillman Dispensary as a method of dealing with the liquor traffic."—R of Rs

"This study of the Tillman movement combines in an unusual degree the sympathy that is essential to any sound biographical work with the critical discrimination that places the man in his true setting. . . . "Miss Simpson can use words admirably at times, either to describe the natural features of the landscape, or the unnatural emotions of man's mind. Sometimes she seems to have hold of an excellent plot—'Good Company' is an instance—which she fails to make the most of. Again, a moving story such as 'The Pledge,' suggests towards the end, uncertainty in the author's mind that slightly lets the reader down. Rye in its marshes and proud Miss Alquist's troubled mind continue to haunt the reader when the book is laid aside."

SINCLAIR, MAY. Far End. 201p $2 Macmillan
[7s 6d Hutchinson]
26-14913

With its golden walls and grey roof, its gardens and terraces, Far End was a lovely cottage. There had never been anything but happiness in it since it was built and when Christopher Vivart brought Hilda Courtney there as his wife they expected to be happy. But tragedy entered the house. Hilda and Christopher grew to hate the place and moved to London. Children came, home cares became exacting and broke in upon the perfect companionship of Hilda and her husband. Christopher began to look to other women for sympathy and things went from bad to worse. Then they decided to go back to Far End. The enchantment of the little house came upon them again. It gathered them into its peace and its sweet and tender memories brought them back to themselves and each other.

"'Far End' is a novel for the amateur rather than for the busy practitioner of life or letters; it answers no questions, offers no advice. At times it is beautiful, at times banal, as life itself is finitely banal. "This is not a book which undertakes to settle any problems; it is not, in any large sense, an interpretation of Asia to the West, but merely the record of random impressions received by two sensitive minds during a year's sojourn in China, Japan and Korea. Caroline Singer writes of Japanese gentlemen taking their evening recreation at the tea house, of her experience at a public bathing beach, of the Japanese stage. She gives us the portrait of a young Chinese intellectual, glimpses of the crowded streets of Peking, of troops in transit, stories of family life. Mr. Baldridge draws for us Geisha girls, temples, laborers at work, children, musicians, sidewalk markets, soldiers—a truly kaleidoscopic sketch book."—N Y Times

SITWELL, OSBERT. Before the bombardment.
334p $2.50 Doran

26-20315

An English seaside resort in the days just before the war is the scene of this satirical comedy of manners which concerns the doings of a group of elderly gossiping women. At the center of the group are two spinsters, the wealthy Miss Collier-Floodgaye and her paid companion, Miss Bramley, winter guests at the chief hotel. They are the innocent target of the gossip of the town which at first distrusts and then admits them to its balls, bazaars and other absurd affairs. Some of the victims of Mr Sitwell's satire are mere caricatures but there is a touch of something almost tender in the description of the childlike Miss Floodgaye, revelling in the fading splendor of the Superb Hotel and poor old Mildred Bramley whom the book leaves scanning the Times "Situations Vacant" column.

"Because Mr. Sitwell has been able to hear the beat of life in even an absurd and obsolete setting his story is not only amusing, but suggestive and moving as well." Mary Ross

"Sometimes the graces and flourishes of Mr. Sitwell's style are too abundant; the description of the market in Newborough is brilliantly ineffectual; the death scene, described in the same style as serves the author very well in other situations, is unconvincing. But otherwise the book is consistently in one key, as a comedy should be; and the unflinching wit of style and characterization makes it delightful. It is easily superior to anything that Mr. Sitwell has written hitherto, and is, indeed, a remarkable piece of work." Edwin Muir

"There can be no gainsaying the fact that Osbert Sitwell has not fallen a whit from his high estate as a writer—when writing may be distinguished from the thing written. But he has proved that he is not a novelist—or, at least, not yet a novelist. In not over 200 pages 'Before the Bombardment,' would have impressed one as a peculiarly artistic and sensitive piece of work. The mood established at the outset would have maintained itself. We wish Mr. Sitwell would take his book back and cut it down. But that can't be done now. We regret that the publishers did not have him do it before printing."

"The first merit of this book, after its sanity, is the excellence of its style. The author has a real command of language and uses it crisply. The story, entirely of the non-sentimental, non-erratic kind, describes the relationship of two old ladies. All the dingy grandeur, all the petty social fever, the spites and ambitions of a seaside town come pouring into the tale, and the characters are so deftly drawn as to strike the reader with all the completeness and animation of real life. Before the bombardment is like Cranford in this, but with an added asperity, like Thackeray though even yet more ironical."

Not that the beginning of the book is not highly self-conscious art; it is so well done that it must necessarily be so; but afterwards we are let too much into the secret, the machinery is not concealed, and we seem to overhear Mr. Sitwell being ingenious. Nevertheless, this book is sufficiently remarkable, and in it Mr. Sitwell shows an unexpected gift for making characters alive and interesting, by describing their dress and the furniture of their houses."

of healing and of faith, what wonder that she should strongly bend her great gift to service and to the alleviation of suffering? Thus it comes about that Dorcas goes to live in a most evil-seeming place in Factory End. There she nurses the mad and the sinful, holds the sick child that the ritualistic literal young rector christens, casts out devils, preaches to the men. And with it all she grows in suffering, simplicity, and faith. SMITH, THOMAS VERNOR. Democratic way of life. 211p $1.75 Univ. of Chicago press

321.8 Democracy 26-19031

The author, who is assistant professor of philosophy in the University of Chicago, treats democracy as a way of life rather than as a political principle. He sets before the minds of those disillusioned by the failures of democracy and the faithlessness of its professors a new vision of the ideal which has inspired so many in the past. He analyzes the aims expressed in the rather vague symbols—fraternity, liberty, equality, and applies these ideals to life in the actual workaday world and to the conception of leadership.

"Mr. Smith has brought to these principles of democracy, upon which so much enthusiasm has been lavished and over which so much disappointment has been felt, an undeniable tinge of modernity. He has formulated a democratic credo, a profession of the social faith of a modern man."

SNOWDEN, JAMES HENRY. Truth about Mormonism. 369p il $2.50 Doran; Westminster press

298 Mormons and Mormonism 26-15360

In the nearly one hundred years since Joseph Smith published the Book of Mormon and organized his church, Mormonism has had a varied and turbulent career. The author of this book, a Presbyterian minister and professor of systematic theology in a Western theological seminary, tells the story of the origin and history of the Mormon church and hierarchy, explains its chief doctrines and sketches the careers of its prophets, Joseph Smith and Brigham Young. The last chapter deals with Mormonism today and gives the opinions of some contemporary observers.

"The book is dull, sketchy, and platitudinous. It contributes nothing to the already overwhelming mass of propaganda on both sides of the subject. Those naughty Mormons have had fingers shaken at them for generations, and Dr. Snowden's finger wags in the same old way." M. R. Werner

Their biographer keeps an even hand, concluding his work, he says, as he started it, with a genuine admiration for both statesmen. The two are sharply contrasted, the interesting difference being brought out that Gladstone always thought of politics in terms of morals while to Disraeli political issues were matters of opinion.

In the first place, they are told with great simplicity. And although Mr Southwold on occasion does not disdain something in the way of a moral or instruction, he never allows them for a moment to interfere with his business as story-teller. Natural history and science could, I think, not be more beautifully subdued to the necessities of a story for a small child than they are in Tem-pus the Slayer and The Red Flower; and the moral could hardly be pointed more delicately than in The Caterpillar's Last Tale and Something to Crow About. But the chief delight of Mr Southwold's stories is the way in which he uses the ordinary things and events of a child's daily life."

Mr Sparrow's book consists of two sections. The second and longer part is devoted to a review of the work of British etchers from the earliest known etching of Francis Barlow, 1652, thru Seymour Haden's long career ending in 1910. The first part sketches the work of foreign etchers who have worked in Great Britain—Hollar, Van Dyck, Herkomer, Whistler and Legros. There are illustrations of 156 etchings.

This inquiry into changing political condi-

influence or control was undertaken by Mr

the political temper in each of these countries.
His book discusses briefly the new Turkey, and

"Spengler's philosophy seeks to establish the conception of our civilization as being just a single point in the cultural universe, around which other civilizations exist, and have existed, independently, and that they are just as important as ours. Ours, like others, must pass through the inevitable stages of all growth:
youth, maturity, old age, and death. Western civilization is in the second last stage. To evade this fact, which is proven by analogies from past history, to bewail it, or to try romantically to deflect the stream of this evolution is futile.
... When the soul of a culture 'has actualized
the full sum of its possibilities in the shape of peoples, languages, dogmas, arts, states, sciences,' when its aim has been attained, 'the Culture suddenly hardens, it mortifies, its blood congeals, its force breaks down, and it becomes

822 Beaumont, Francis. Fletcher, John. Theater—Great Britain—History. English drama—Restoration—History and criticism 26-15680

"The stage history of an author's plays is an important commentary on his 'survival value' and it is interesting to remember that, with the re-opening of the theatres in England after the Puritan rule, Beaumont and Fletcher plays were given much more frequently than those of Shakespeare. The ratio was about two to one in favor of the joint authors, a fact which amply justifies Dr. Sprague's meticulous and exhaustive study of the fifty years following the restoration of Charles II in 1660. In the first section of his book he gives, as completely as the fairly extensive records make possible, the dates of the production of each play, with the original casts and important later productions, interwoven with the comments and criticism of contemporary writers and playgoers, thereby giving a first-hand impression of the reception of the plays by the Restoration audiences. The second half of his book is devoted to a detailed study of some twenty adaptations and re-writings of Beaumont and Fletcher plays, with particular emphasis on the contrasting demands of the Jacobean and Restoration theatres."—Theatre Arts Mo

Among these we may specially mention G. Bouchard's 'Social Life in Prague.'" — + Times [London] Lit Sup Mr 11 '26 700w

We also had to overcome a first impression that it reflected too much the unfortunate disturbed conditions through which these nations have just been passing; but again a more careful examination shows that everything possible has been done, not only to bring the book closely up-to-date—so that it is not without evidence of stabilization—but also to choose for presentation on the whole those documents and articles that have more than passing significance." STEELE, WILBUR DANIEL. Urkey Island. 287p $2 Harcourt

26-7016

These somber stories of the folk of Urkey island off the New England coast, a village at sea completely isolated from the ordinary currents of thought, purport to be written by one who reconstructs the tales from the hearsay of his boyhood. Contents: White hands; Ching, Ching, Chinaman; The wages of sin; Out of exile; Crocuses; "Lost at sea"; Six dollars; Out of the wind.

"'Urkey Island' is not Mr. Steele at his own best. Apart from its creative limitation it suffers from a convention of narrative which has been imposed upon it. It is some quality of the real, the actual, which is wanting in these stories. Mr. Steele is a good psychologist. He is a good story teller. He is not commonplace and he knows how to skip the obvious. But life as an intimate thing eludes him." L. Kronenberger

"Urkey Island is as real to us as though we trod its streets, saw its stonepits and talked with its inhabitants. It is full of color and life and breathing, hating, fearing, and occasionally loving men and women. The individual stories are as different as possible but there is woven through them a spiritual unity which does much to place this volume among Mr. Steele's most noteworthy achievements." D. L. M.

"An examination of these more or less connected tales, concerned with life on an island off the New England coast, discloses that Mr. Steele's favorite theme is retribution and that his favourite device for encompassing it is the highly improbable machinery of coincidence, heavily shrouded in atmosphere. In the handling of these elements he is without question skilful; he has the knack of clothing even his most violent improbabilities with the garments of inevitability. The author is successful in the rôle of an up-to-date Hawthorne."

After demobilization he entered the Central Zionist Office in London. Whilst a convinced Zionist, he understands and appreciates the difficulties which might arise from precipitate action and, therefore, clearly leans towards circumspect moderation and full regard for Arab rights. The book outlines the history of Zionism; then traces the gathering of these, as yet haphazard, velleities into an organized political movement and follows up its development from the First Zionist Congress held at Basle in 1897 to the outbreak of the War; it further gives a concise account of Jewish settlement in Palestine up to 1914. The chapter on the Balfour Declaration supplies the text of all the most important declarations and agreements concerning the Jewish National Home in Palestine."—Spec

In this story of political intrigue with Monte Carlo as its setting, an American writer of romances steps into a mystery more strange and complicated than any of his own fabricating. Invited by one beautiful woman to drive with her to an unknown address, he there meets a second one who asks him to impersonate a famous political figure and in that rôle to appear publicly as her escort. In love with the first lady, pursued by the second, and kidnapped by the man who seems to control both, events move rapidly for the American to a melodramatic climax.

The story covers three generations of change in Chicago, while scenes of a still earlier day are supplied thru the memories of Grampa Wheelock. Changes in the neighborhood drove Zenas Wheelock from his loved Chicago home to Oakland, a suburb of the town. When a real estate boom struck Oakland, the old man refused to sell an inch of his land, but he did give a strip to his neighbor's wife for a garden and lived to see a gaudy flat-building rise upon it. Meanwhile the children of the two families grew up. Both Alan Wheelock and Blanche Holden married unhappily. They should have married each other, for they shared Grampa Wheelock's love of the old and dislike of the showy and new. In following their story from childhood thru maturity to middle age, the shifting background of their times is emphasized.

The author, who is fellow of Queen's college, Oxford, and canon of Hereford, begins his book by outlining a theory of knowledge. This is followed by a definition of the "Life-Force, the Absolute, or God"—whom he fashions in the image of the ideal human character, and of Christ also considered in terms of personality. Then comes a discussion of the fact of evil in the world and of the bearing of the new psychology upon religion.

Nessie Sutton his first love, had vague ambitions for him, but when her intimacy with Abner became known, the outraged hill folk drove her out of town and set upon Abner. A middle aged jeweller gave Nessie his name and a home. Abner found work in a nearby town, and a new and troubling experience in his acquaintance with Adelaide Jones. Bound by a social environment of poor whites, and a mental environment of bigoted ignorance, the story works out with the escape to "something greater" for Adelaide, and a resumption of old ties for Abner and Nessie.

The news of the murder of his father in Virginia reached Francis Havenell in England, while he still mourned for his assassinated friend Stephen Anthony. He set out for America quickly to avenge first his father's death and then the death of his friend. It was the time of Bacon's rebellion, and Havenell, not forgetting his private errand, joined Bacon's cause against the Crown. This, combined with trouble with the Indians, and a threatened negro uprising delayed Havenell's plans and made difficult his wooing of Judith Anthony, Stephen's sister. But all these adventurous paths converged to a single track leading to one man, his mortal enemy, the murderer of both father and friend. Since the redoubtable Francis saw only the bright face of danger the tale could have but one outcome for him.

"Mr. Suffern's book repeats to some extent matter found in both Lubin 'Miners' Wages and the Cost of Coal,' and in Hamilton and Wright 'The Case of Bituminous Coal.' Unfortunately, Mr. Suffern writes in a dreary style. He sets his face resolutely against allowing any trace of the interest bound up in the coal miner's wars to appear in his book. This was not necessary; economics is no longer a 'dismal science.' Mr. Hamilton and Miss Wright showed him a better method. Little that is either new or constructive is offered." W. D. Lane

26-16352

When Paul Rennet dies he does not leave his wife and three children, but continues with them in spirit, watching over them with an understanding and sympathy of which he was incapable in his lifetime. He sees his wife bravely adjusting herself to her straitened circumstances and his son and older daughter resolutely shaping careers for themselves. With his youngest, Julia, nearest to him of all his children during his lifetime, he is in more intimate communion. She alone is conscious of his presence and in her dreams he helps her to attain her artist's vision. He is content with his wife's remarriage and with his children's affairs. As their need of him grows less his clear vision of them vanishes and he fades out of consciousness.

973.91 United States—History—1898-

This is the first of a four-volume work on the social and political history of the first twenty-five years of the present century in the United States. "The purpose of the narrative," the author tells us, "is to follow an average American thru this quarter-century of his country's history, to recreate the flow of the days as he saw them, to picture events in terms of their influence on him, his daily life and ultimate destiny. The aim is to appraise the actors of history and their activities according to the way they affected the average man." It is not a connected history that Mr Sullivan provides but rather the raw materials of history, as shown in a panorama of the life of the times—leaders and issues, economic conditions, fashions, amusements, the books people read, the songs they sang, etc. The book is copiously illustrated.

"It is refreshing to find such an excellent grasp of public health in a book which reviews in a broad way the historical aspect of social, political and economic development in the United States during the past twenty-five years. This book commends itself to public health workers because of the remarkable grasp of the writer of the results on the population of the United States of the changing habits of life and the development of transportation, as well as our political and social unrest." He reduces the entire governmental show to insignificance in comparison with the multifarious interests which really came home to the heart and hearth of the average man in our time, augmenting his satisfactions, widening his imagination. SUNDERLAND LEWIS, WALTER REGINALD. Cubwood; with an introd. by Walter De La Mare. 346p $2 A. & C. Boni [7s 6d Lane]

"Mr. Walter de la Mare has contributed a careful and sensitive introduction to this story of boyhood. The story deals with that period which has been neglected for the facile glamour of childhood, the 'tadpole' stage, when boys turn to adventure, use catapults, rude words, and pea-shooters, are totally ill-mannered, treasure penknives, and exercise fists and legs in equal proportion. Here is a handful of real boys who had enviable adventures, both imaginary and real, after school hours, in a fascinating wood. Among them romps Hilda, an engaging little tomboy, indifferent, saucy, wise, tossing her head contemptuously in the presence of small boys."—Nation and Ath

"'Cubwood' seems the work of a gifted amateur. It has the originality, the faint and imperfect charm of a writer unused to fiction and incapable of its professional compactness. It has also the frequent dullness, the looseness, the inefficacy of such a writer. If he is to appreciate its effect and perceive its merit the reader must throw overboard whatever arbitrary standards he may have for judging a book. And he must anticipate being often bored and often dissatisfied." L: Kronenberger

+ Books (N Y Herald Tribune) p11 Ap 4 '26 620w

"The adults are depicted decidedly through the eyes of youngsters and are therefore excellent, for they 'resemble' drawings children make of them out of proportion and perspective. Full of the trivialities of life, commingled with the happenings, vivid in horror, often involved, quite lacking in humor, this tale is 'far from being serious, starts from nothing, leads nowhere and has not the vestige of a moral.' As, however, it helps the reader to experience again his irretrievable childhood, it is unusual."

Boston Transcript p4 Mr 24 '26 300w

"It seems to us, he has written a singular book, one which will manage a long race with Time. It is told in no hurry. There are vast stretches of dullness and apparent iteration. The children speak to each other in the rhythm and idiom of adult conversation. It is a unique book, however, because, in spite of Mr. Lewis' manner of telling the story, the children remain children." Walter Yust

+ — Lit R p4 Mr 6 '26 950w

"It is a book for 'grown-ups'; we see ourselves here, out of drawing, as we must really appear to youngsters with whom we are never really natural in manner or conversation. Much that appears sophisticated in the book may be due to the rather full style, but in the wood, delightful, sombre, unexplored, there is compensation."

+ Nation and Ath 36:589 Ja 24 '25 250w

"I cannot share the enthusiasm expressed by Mr. Walter De La Mare in his introduction to Cubwood. I agree with Mr. De La Mare that it is hard for us to remember what the world looked like when we were little boys in the tadpole stage, that Mr. Lewis has an uncanny knack of remembering, and that the queer, savage distortions of the picture do not prove it false. But is it worth while? One sees

For twenty years Prince Michael had persisted in his love for his cousin the countess and in the hope that she would one day obtain a divorce and marry him. At the end of that time he discovered how completely she had deceived him. Mary Lane knew Prince Michael's history but loved and married him in spite of it, and remained devoted to him when the results of his youthful folly brought disaster to two young people very near and dear to them both. Following the career of the prince and Mary, and the young couple, Anna and Paul, the story moves in strictly fashionable circles in England and on the continent.

SWEENEY, JAMES SHIRLEY. Natural increase of mankind; a study in world population; introd. by William H. Welch. 185p $4 Williams & Wilkins [18s Baillier]

312 Population. Vital statistics 26-10988

"This book is the outcome of a long and painstaking research on a statistical attribute of populations much discussed in recent years by Raymond Pearl, and called by him the 'vital index.' It is the ratio of births to deaths in a population, and obviously indicates the rate at which growth is occurring at the time. The author has laboriously calculated this statistic for the populations of all the different countries of the world for which there are available sufficiently accurate and extensive records of births and deaths. He has then submitted these figures to analysis along the lines laid down by the Pearsonian school of biometrics. The net result is to give a general picture of the present biological status of these populations, their trends in the past, and probable future courses."—Sat R of Lit

"This most absorbing volume should be read by everyone interested in the problem of population. Without a knowledge of this work one must fail to possess a very serviceable approach to the problem. It was Swinburne's intention to gather into one volume his many poems of infancy and childhood. Mr Edmund Gosse has carried out the poet's intention in the present volume for which Mr Arthur Rackham has made the illustrations.

SWINNERTON, FRANK ARTHUR. Summer storm. 341p $2 Doran

"'Summer Storm' is the story of the competition of two very ordinary girls for a man who is not particularly worth having. Beatrice, who has had an unfortunate sex history, is unsympathetically described. She is supposed to be a virgin, but the secret unkindly revealed is that she has had several lovers in her time. . . She wants to marry Henry Falconer, a middle-aged clubman and idler, who has the sneaking feeling round his heart that he'd like to settle down. At first he wants Beatrice, but, the fresher creature Polly being thrown in his way, his love changes its course."—Books (N Y Herald Tribune)

"Despite limitations the book is a significant addition to the growing mass of documentary collections dealing with various aspects of the colonization of the West. The form, appearance, and editing of the volume are excellent. The canons of historical editing have been followed with precision. Thru the cabin wall which concealed his own misery from his equally seasick neighbors, Laurence Ogle, playwright, became disagreeably aware of Mr. Tinker's voice booming inquiries of his wretched wife and daughter. From the very sound of that too, too hearty voice, Laurence knew he would hate the man. As he did. For the voice matched its owner, a Middle Western giant, loud, hearty, genial, and quite uncultivated. Laurence's scorn of him rapidly extended to the wife and daughter, and he tried to ignore all three, devoting himself to Mme. Momoro. Mr. Tinker, however, was not the man to be ignored. Even after they all left the ship to meet by chance in Algiers and again in Tunis, he loomed large on the playwright's horizon, unconsciously taking from him the affections of Mme. Momoro and reluctantly yielding to him those of his daughter Olivia.

Here is another portrait of a selfish and temperamental author who is utterly but quite unconsciously dependent on the ministrations of a self-effacing wife, to feed and make him comfortable, oil the household machinery and provide the peace which he found essential to his creative efforts. But Mary had allowed herself to get fat and frumpy and the children were bothersome. In pretty Diana Kinkade, daughter of the friend of his youth, who came to the Johns household for an indefinite visit Stanley found the stimulus so lacking in Mary, so much stimulus indeed that he could do no work at all. From the plight into which he was led by his own foolishness and Diana's, he was barely rescued by the understanding and forgiving Mary.

"Miss Taylor has done a delightful piece of work. It has a faint flavor of E. Temple Thurston to it, with a whiff of—let us say—Elizabeth's German Garden. It is altogether enchanting because it is a perfect thing of its kind, a character sketch of a good woman, who has a sense of humor, though no taste in clothes, and who is so lovely all the while that we long to sit at her feet." 919.5 Papua—Description and travel

Papua is a part of New Guinea which became a British possession in 1883. Half of it has never been explored and the other part is little known. The book tells how a small party of white men penetrated this unexplored cannibal land. They encountered natives who had never seen a white man, witch doctors and sorcerers, a savage uprising, and almost incredible hardships in this mountainous and hostile land.

"When 'Flame and Shadow' was published, many of us thought that Sara Teasdale would hardly surpass it in her next volume. Yet in 'Dark of the Moon,' perhaps, she is more truly herself than ever she was before. Her esthetic doctrine of unflinching loyalty to the truth 'as it is felt' has taught her how to give her times lyrics which, even when they are saddest, have an ennobling clarity and sincerity, because they never veil or evade the hurt and hardness of life. Wherefore, as of old, she finds more joy in sorrow than most of us ever find in joy. And her music—let glib theorists about meters be silent and listen!" Marguerite Wilkinson

"Sara Teasdale's most formidable rival is herself. From the appearance of her 'Sonnets to Duse' in 1907, hers was a triumphal progress till that first decade culminated in 'Love Songs' with the public recognition of the Columbia University prize. But the volume of 1920, 'Flame and Shadow,' so far excels them all that, after these six waiting years, we hardly dare ask if the new volume registers a still higher attainment. The earlier qualities are here in undiminished charm—the artistry, the magic, the directness of utterance bearing out her own testimony." K. L. Bates

"She is a lithe, simple, spontaneous lyricist, her voice remaining as pure as it was ten years ago but carrying a maturer note. "The tempo is slower throughout than that to which she has accustomed us, to fit the more sombre thought. But the clear melody, the reverberant simplicity of statement are the same. "The poetry of Sara Teasdale is not colorful poetry any more than it is emotional poetry. Her feeling for silver is, perhaps, significant. What we have called the gleaming austerity of the metal might without hyperbole be extended to characterize her art. To many, no doubt, this will seem synonymous with calling it cold. But Sara Teasdale's poetry is not cold; it is merely that she has brought her art to such a degree of refinement that her poetry takes on the air of exclusiveness. For those who have attained the corresponding refinement of taste, 'Dark of the Moon' holds many poems greatly to be prized." F. A. Hutchison

The life of the Cambridge scholar and historian, biographer of Cavour, is told thru his letters, for he left no other personal records. The letters tell the story of a life devoted to literature. A trip to Italy with his mother, while he was still a youth, awakened his interest in Italian history and inspired his determination to write the life of Cavour, which brought him his chief fame. Biographies of John Hay and of Roosevelt followed and the war years found the historian an ardent propagandist of the war and our participation in it.

THOMAS, ELISABETH FINLEY. Rendezvous. 311p $2 Bobbs

26-7656

Evelyn Carrington spent her childhood in the House of affection, the family home in New Haven. There followed years of study in Paris where she lived with her aunt in the luxurious entourage furnished by her aunt's lover, though Eve was too young to know that. This was the House of passion. Home again, a career as an artist, then marriage to Winston, and a sojourn in the House of love. For a time marriage stilled an old longing for the ideal mate. But in the course of the years, Win fell far short of that ideal, and as a climax of unfaithfulness died in a place where he ought never to have been. Early in her widowhood Eve renounced happiness with the at last realized ideal, and devoted the rest of her life to embellishing her son's false idea of his father.

A young English novelist who was only eleven years old when the war began tells a moving story of its almost irreparable effect on the life of a young girl of the period. Zina Renner, gently bred daughter of an English baronet, is about to marry a brilliant young Oxford idealist, Colin Russell, but he is caught in the first clutch of the war and shortly reported, "Missing, probably killed." Zina, whose experience has shown her nothing of the harsher side of life is hardened by her cruel loss and suffers a shell shock of the soul as tragic as Colin's shell-shock, from which, after four years' loss of memory he recovers and is found by Zina's father in a Paris hospital. Zina in the meantime has allowed herself to drift into marriage with a man for whom she had no love but who offered her a life of wide interests. The problem is whether or not to tell Zina of Colin's return. It is her little sister Wendy with her direct mind and square facing of facts, without sentimentality, who cuts a way to the heart of the problem.

590 Natural history (26-26536)

The plan of this work is similar to the "Outline of science" edited by Professor Thomson. Each of the three volumes is complete in itself. There is no formal arrangement into classes of animals, each of the great divisions of mammals, birds, fishes and reptiles being treated in part in each volume. The animals are described in relation to their surroundings, with much attention to their habits. Many illustrations supplement the text, some of these being in color and specially drawn for this work.

841.08 French poetry—Collections. French poetry—Translations into English

These one hundred French poems which are given in the original and in English translation on parallel pages are drawn from the thirteenth to the twentieth century, but the greater number are from modern or contemporary poets.

"It is a good collection, containing poems of Rimbaud and Baudelaire that are seldom seen in anthologies. The translating is smooth but not outstanding, not sharp."

+ Bookm 64:366 N '26 160w

"His selections are admirable and his talents considerable although his work is far from even. On the whole, his book fulfils its intended purpose quite well enough; it fairly represents the procession of French poets, conveys the spirit of the originals and at times achieves authentic English beauties." B. R. Redman

+ Books (N Y Herald Tribune) p18 S 19 '26 280w

"This is a charming selection from among the French poets, ranging from Jehan Froisart to Paul Fort—a selection made for the very best reasons; they please the translator—a hundred poems in all. Wilfrid Thorley is a poet of no mean ability and he enjoys an excellent conviction that original poems should in their renderings seem original, else the translator has failed."

+ Lit R p3 Ag 28 '26 240w

"Mr. Thorley's success as a translator is quite remarkable. French poetry in English has a way of seeming rather insipid; but Mr. Thorley has managed to substitute for the smooth modulations of French verse the more vigorous rhythms of English. His principal fault is an inveterate addiction to the conventional language of poetic tradition, so that an effect of simplicity or directness is sometimes lost. It is also true that Mr. Thorley tends a little to make all the poets sound alike."

+ New Repub 43:383 N 17 '26 160w

"The title of this anthology of verse-translations from the French poets is unfortunate: it suggests dilettantism and sentimentality. But we have only to open the book and read one poem to see that Mr. Thorley does not possess these faults. The anthology is on the whole an excellent one; it is by omission that Mr. Thorley sins, and we cannot help wishing that so skilful a translator had attempted several poems that are still more representative of their author's best work than those which he has chosen."

+ New Statesman 27:422 J1 24 '26 450w

"The book is highly pleasing; Mr. Thorley's English version is respectable, sometimes charming verse. Naturally, it is not poetry of the first order."

As a compilation, however, his book is more valuable than the 'Outlines' with which we have lately been inundated." J: Cournos

"With due allowance for its vast scale, the book is probably as sound in its facts as any single individual alive today could make it. As to its estimates of the civilization it reviews that is another and more contentious matter. On the whole they are prompted by a naïvely whole-hearted acceptance of our current standards of judgment and rarely do more than scratch the surface. In fact its deficiency in interpretative understanding is the most immediate weakness of this courageous venture." Ferdinand Schevill

THORPE, CLARENCE DE WITT. Mind of John Keats. 209p $2.50 Oxford [12s 6d Milford] B or 92 Keats, John 26-9702

"As his title indicates, Dr. Thorpe confines himself to a study of the mind of Keats, with only an occasional side glance at biographical issues. Now the mind of a poet is chiefly concerned with poetry, as the mind of a philosopher is with philosophy or that of a scientist with science; the heart of his mind, so to speak, is to be found in his aesthetics. Dr. Thorpe's work necessarily becomes primarily so to speak, is to be found in the aesthetics. His main source is the correspondence of the poet, of which he makes fuller and more judicious use than any previous critic." —Books (N Y Herald Tribune)

"There are certain minor defects in the book which it is to be hoped may be rectified in a later edition. An index is much needed. The many passages that are quoted from the letters should certainly in every case be dated. The author, particularly in the early part of the book, is too lenient toward his own style, readily accepting the cliché in default of individual statement. When the reader comes upon such a phrase as 'the cheery optimism of Keats' he might be pardoned if he closed the book forthwith. Yet if he did so he would make a regrettable mistake. He would miss nothing less than one of the best books yet written upon one of the greatest poets." E. S. Bates

It is the story of the young landlord Irteney, who loves his charming wife, but is attracted by a passionate 'desire of the flesh' to a peasant woman with whom he had had relations before his marriage. Powerless to resist the temptation and exasperated by the fear of succumbing to it, he kills the woman or, according to an alternative ending, commits suicide."—N Y Times

TOWNE, CHARLES HANSON. Tinsel. 314p $2 Appleton

26-3568

For years the ample Mrs Nesbit has indulged her harmless passion for parades by appearing as a colossal Miss Columbia in the local celebration of the Fourth. The time comes when husband and children can bear the yearly exhibition no longer. They rebel. Henceforth the Fourth of July parade is closed to her. Not so the fashion parade of Newport and Palm Beach. Backed by Mr Nesbit's millions, made in awnings, and sponsored by Mrs Van Anders, she joins this new and still more tinselled procession with results to her family far more serious than from the Miss Columbia episode. Retreating from the brink of disaster, they return to Eureka and the awning business, with Mrs Nesbit a sadder and a wiser woman, cured of pretension and parades.

"Hugh Dillon, a young idealist, is practicing criminal law to get a foothold. The heroine, Moira Devens, is the daughter of a very wealthy contractor and politician. Richard Devens, Moira's father, was murdered and the story hinges on the conviction of the murderer. The officials concerned show greater anxiety to obtain favorable publicity for themselves and petty political advantages than to see that justice is done. A strong chain of circumstantial links tighten around an innocent victim. It culminates in a dramatically projected trial scene. It is an intensely interesting story, and on account of the author's vast knowledge of the practices of crime, of detection, and the criminal law, has much of the atmosphere of the Criminal Courts Building and of Tombs Prison."—Cleveland staff notes

TREND, JOHN BRANDE. Alfonso the sage, and other Spanish essays. 216p $4 Houghton [12s Constable]

860.4 Spanish literature. Spain

"From the twenty essays which are included in this volume the reader achieves a piquant, if hasty, acquaintance with a few of the less famous of Spain's classic authors, and quite a thorough knowledge of the tendencies and the talents of the more important contemporary novelists and poets. The three sections into which the book is divided (Kings, Queens, and Classics; Modern Prose Writers; and Modern Poets), are separated by colorful and amusing 'Interludes' in which are described Spanish fairies, children at play, gardens, and the Dance of the Seises at Seville. Though it is a scholarly work, 'Alfonso the sage' is more appreciative than critical."—Sat R of Lit

"Mr. Trend is a scholar and something of an artist. He has lived sensitively on the High Peninsula. He has met, intelligently, many of its most intelligent people. And his cool, slender prose fashions a delightful goblet for quaffing the passionate wine of the Spanish spirit. My most adverse criticism of this book is the fundamental. The author chats about Spain and never gives you Spain. His work is fragmentary; its often fine convictions upon many matters remain unconvincing. To the reader who already possesses Spain, it gives nothing. To the reader who wants Spain it gives scantily more." Waldo Frank

"Already Mr. Trevelyan's 'History of England' is a 'best-seller,' and deservedly, for it is perhaps the best single-volume history of England yet written. The difficulties of writing on this subject a work in one volume embodying the results of modern historical research are so great that it might well prove to be the last, at least for a long time to come. Mr. Trevelyan has made a very gallant and brilliant attempt to overcome these difficulties, yet in spite of his exceptional qualifications for the task, his success, undoubted though it is, remains incomplete."

"By a judicious mingling of the chronological, political, economic, sociological, military, and personal, there is produced a dramatic and moving history of the evolution of a country and its institutions, illumined by great knowledge, enriched with apt quotation, and developed with a literary skill which sets it apart from the majority of its competitors." "Mr. Trevelyan has done a thing so difficult that perhaps one's temptation is to overpraise: at all events, his limitations should be indicated. Almost every page of his book presupposes a knowledge of the history of England: it would be of very little service to the previously quite uninstructed. In his own word, it is an essay rather than a history. But it is also a textbook of very high value for the student of University age, because it gives so admirably a sense of the story as a whole. Naturally, from the scope of the subject, from 1600 onwards the essay prevails over the history: themes are rapidly swept up and bundled on one side. It seems to this reader that the earlier half of the book is fresher and more vital."

But he will be a strange reader who does not feel that what it seeks after is always the thing as it really was or is. We have lately had a great deal of brilliancy, paradox and epigram brought into the service or disservice of history. But how soon one grows weary of these dialectical fireworks! It is a relief to turn from all that puffing and spluttering, so brilliant in the darkness but nowhere else, to such pages as those of Mr. Trevelyan, all full of knowledge and sanity and daylight of truth."

VACHELL, HORACE ANNESLEY. Woman in exile. 329p $2 Stokes

This is the story of a marriage for love between a wealthy Californian and a well born English girl. It is written from the point of view of the wife, an intelligent, lovable person, who remains thoroughly English throughout her exile. The husband is no less likeable and no less in love. The early period of the marriage is happy; adjustments are easily made. With the war comes the first real bitterness, leaving a scar that later years of greater love and greater understanding cannot wholly efface. When the children are grown, and contrary to the mother's hopes are unmistakably American, she returns with them from England, reconciled to exile.

The protagonists of the piece are two married couples—Ann and William, Stephen and Edith—and Emily, their friend, a prosperous unmarried business woman. They are cultured, well-to-do people and move in a literary and artistic milieu. Their long-standing friendship has developed on the part of Ann and Stephen into a new and urgent intimacy. William and Edith, standing aside to watch this development with what grace is given them, find brief comfort in each other. Running thru the tale of these marital entanglements is the love story of Rachel, Ann's sister, and Paul, their courtship, their marriage, and its abrupt and tragic end. The title refers to the fact that however near to each other two people may come, fundamentally they remain strangers.

"'Strangers' is a first novel and shows it. In many ways it is plainly not the work of an experienced writer. The description and narration are not always well integrated. There are long accounts of dinners, room furnishings and baths which fail to arouse much interest. There are characters which only half live, in whose veins flows theory rather than blood. There is a good deal of conversation distinguished neither for wit nor profundity. But there are many elements in the book which indicate that Mrs. Van Doren can tell a story that will appeal. She knows how to maintain suspense and she has an instinct for choosing subjects in which many people are interested." Garreta Busey

There is so little incident in the life of Ignatius Loyola that this book is chiefly an account of the development of a soul—a soul absorbed by religion and concentrated upon one task, the formation of the Company of Jesus. The formation of the famous order, its constitutions, work, and missions and the opposition it met are described and interpreted.

The feud between the Bevans and the Lloyds, Welsh peasant farmers, is the element upon which the plot repeatedly turns. While away from home on a visit Esther Bevan meets Rhys Lloyd and their love goes out to each other. She is all unconscious, and Rhys also, that he is the son of her father's sworn enemy. The hatred between the houses flames up with such intensity when the fact becomes known that the lovers are torn apart and Rhys emigrates to Canada hoping some day that Esther will join him there. One after another Esther's family make claim upon her protective instinct and self-sacrificing love and when she is finally free to go to Rhys, he, wearied of waiting and hurt by her seeming indifference, has married another. Years later he returns to Wales, but with all other hindrances removed, pride still keeps him and Esther apart. Finally an accident cripples Rhys. His need of her conquers her pride and the battle goes to the weak.

The first series of Queen Victoria's letters, in three volumes edited by A. C. Benson and Viscount Esher, appeared in 1907. These volumes brought the royal correspondence down to the death of the Prince consort in 1861. The present volumes continue the story to the close of 1878. "Though they may seem dull in comparison [with the earlier volumes], they are full of historic importance and throw a very strong light on the Queen's character and mental abilities. VICTORIN, MARIE. Chopping bee, and other Laurentian stories. 255p il $2 Musson bk. [7s 6d Hodder & S.]

Brother Victorin of the College of Saint Jerome, Quebec, has written these stories of French Canada, stories redolent of the soil and the habitants' love for it. They are true stories for the most part, drawn from his own experience and sympathetically translated by James Ferres. The title story is about a magnificent elm, centuries old, around which affection and legend had gathered. All the countryside sorrowed when the old tree was condemned to death. Contents: The chopping bee; The madonna's rosebush; The wayside cross of St Norbet; Farming on the embankment; The lonely heart; The old farm not for sale; The cordwood donation bee; The pioneer of Temiskaming; A people without a history; Le petit mousse noir.

Here is told with delicacy and reticence the story of a love strong enough to pay its price and unselfish enough to admit of thought for others. Sir Charles Storm, a widower on the threshold of middle age and at the height of his career at the bar, has the misfortune to fall in love with another man's wife. The neglect and faithlessness of Mrs Harvard's husband give ample cause for divorce but Storm must count the cost of divorce court publicity to Tonia's sensitiveness and to his own career. More important still is the hurt to the budding romance of Storm's young son who has just become engaged to a girl of aristocratic family whose conservatism and devout Catholicism will not tolerate the scandal of divorce. The climax of the story is reached when Storm has to choose between his own passionate desires and his love for his son.

From an ex-crook, Inspector Dick Martin first hears of the door with the seven locks. Before his story is complete the crook is murdered. Sent to recover a stolen library book Dick visits the house of an Italian scientist whose unholy experiments have earlier brought him to police notice. From this house of horror the inspector picks up a trail that leads to Selford Manor, to the Selford tombs and to the door with seven locks barring its gruesome secret. Whereupon Dick sets himself to find the missing keys, to

WALLACE, EDGAR. King by night. 339p $2 Doubleday

In this exceedingly complicated story the king by night is Juma, a half mad Negro colossus who is spreading terror thruout London by a series of killings. The fact that his victims are nearly all Australians and men of note is evidence that some person is using Juma as a tool in a systematic plan. The disappearance of an American millionaire seems to be part of the same plan. Several Americans, including the missing man's niece, are in England seeking clues. They are aided by the able Selby Lowe of the British secret service who ferrets out the man behind the murders and anticipates his confession.

"Betcher" Long got his nickname from his habit of making wild wagers. The disconcerting thing about these wagers, however fantastic, was the fact that Betcher always won. In a series of exploits against hardy criminals he had made an enviable reputation with Scotland Yard, but the chief, knowing the mettle of the Terrible people, had little hope of Long's success or safety in coming to grips with them. Betcher's own feelings he did not disclose. But the death struck from behind, one after another of those who with Betcher helped to bring one of the Terrible people to the gallows, the young investigator kept relentlessly after the rest of the gang until he had once more justified his nickname and signed up for a honeymoon.

B or 92 Wagner, Richard 26-119

'Dare it be said,' he writes, 'that in his music Wagner shows us just what he was not in his life?' It must be said, if there is any truth in the picture given us of his life. A little sarcasm seasons a biography, but Mr. Wallace has been too prodigal, and he lavishes it all on the central figure. He was anxious to overthrow a false idol, but he has gone too far, and where others have seen a god he sees a gargoyle. Nevertheless, it is a good book. WALLACE, WILLIAM KAY. Thirty years of modern history. 293p $4 Macmillan [10s 6d Allen & U.]

909.8 History, Modern

In this volume the historical factors are outlined that have determined the course of events during the past thirty years. Among these factors are William II of Germany and his doctrine of the will to power; the revival of France and the plan of French foreign policy which was successfully carried forward during three decades; the entrance of the United States into world affairs; the rise of Japan; the expansion of national states into world powers and the development of politics into world politics. The last section of the book is devoted to the cycle of revolutions initiated by the World war, the growth of the international idea and its embodiment in the League of nations.

"Mr. Wallace's book, as history, is incomplete and sketchy because his method has been highly selective; as philosophy or prophecy, the volume is turgid and often self-contradictory." H. S.

"If Mr. Wallace does not persuade us that he has always succeeded in extracting, in his own phrase, the ore of relevant facts, at least he refrains from burying us under mountainous masses in detail. He has the merit that he does elucidate the general principles in the light of which he has made his review of contemporary history, and if the factors with which he deals may not count for quite as much as he suggests, his challenging presentation makes excellent reading."

WALLAS, GRAHAM. Art of thought. 314p $2.50 Harcourt

153 Thought and thinking 26-11575

"The author's main argument is this: that we must have an art of thought that will control every system of life in order to harmonize ourselves with the national and international problems of the world, including many individual problems of life. And in this art our 'will' must control our thought. This Will of ours going through its successive stages in creation is in a position to control our thought and then the art of thought becomes possible in the sense in which the author speaks of it. Mr. Wallas brings out the stages through which every scientific student must pass in his growth. There are, he says, four stages: Preparation, Incubation, Illumination and Verification."—Lit R

WALPOLE, HUGH. Harmer John; an unworldly story. 411p $2 Doran

Ushered in by wind and rain Hjalmar Johanson came to the cathedral town of Polchester. He was a Swede, a gymnasium instructor, who carried in his great splendid frame the gentle heart of a dreamer. He opened a gymnasium in Polchester, and because the town was ready for the cult of the physical, it was a success from the first. But unfortunately for himself, Harmer John, as Polchester called him, had an interest in men's souls that exceeded his concern for their bodies. He preached to them a new and beautiful Polchester free from slums, from vice and degradation. Even the canons of the cathedral were divided, some with Harmer John, others secretly against him. As his mission persisted the town that had enthusiastically taken him up turned as fiercely against him, and in a storm of hate cast him out. Tho he lost in love as in his great cause, the book closes on Harmer John a compelling, triumphant figure.

"'Tropic Death' takes rank with Jean Toomer's 'Cane' as a bravely beautiful collection of short stories by a man of negro blood. Eric Walrond illumines the life of the negro in the American tropics as Mr. Toomer visualized his ways of being in the Southern country and the Northern cities of the United States. The two volumes give a complete picture of this transplanted race in America. Mr. Walrond ranges over the islands of Jamaica and Barbados, depicts the teeming multitudes that helped to build the Panama Canal, dips into Honduras and the jungles of the Guianas of South America. The stories are objective and immediate. Mr. Walrond dramatizes the present moment with overpowering actuality, yet he conveys a universe of implication."—N Y Times

"The ten stories gathered in Tropic Death have three separate sources of distinction which differentiate them from contemporary fiction. They are almost the virgin working of a rich new field, the black West Indies, where a seething mass of conglomerate races and colors provide the mobile labor force needed to exploit the tropics. Walrond handles this material from the inside, as a Negro with, one suspects, a direct experience of the labor gangs. This is the second important distinction. The third distinction is a personal triumph. Walrond is an artist working not imitatively in subservience to the accepted literary traditions of an alien race, but his own manner suited to his own material—as an equal." Robert Herrick

A discussion of ethics in the teaching profession as applied to relations between the school board and the school staff, and between the teacher and his colleagues, his class, and the community. In conclusion the author draws up a tentative code of ethics for educators.

It should be read with interest by those who are actually engaged in educational work, as well as those who are preparing for it, that their influence may be thrown in favor of the building up of such a code as the one the author tentatively presents. WARD, CHRISTOPHER. One little man. 369p $2.50 Harper

Herbie was born to be imposed upon. A gentle, unassertive little man, he was a fighter only in his dreams. Bill, tho ten years younger, had rapidly caught up with and passed his plodding brother, moving on to marriage and a partnership in the firm. To Herbie this was all good. Pride in Bill's success left no room for envy. Then romance came to Herbie, too, brought by bold, handsome Rosie whose hardness was momentarily softened by the wistfulness, the passionate tenderness of this little man. She married him and with the birth of a baby daughter Herbie touched his height of happiness. Then Rosie went away with her lover, and the little man let her go, for she left him all his life could hold, his daughter and his dreams.

Hedged about by her father's dotting affection till she was past thirty, on his death she went to live with her brother and his family. Thus her position was always ancillary. At the age of forty-seven she revolted and fled to a remote village in the Chilterns, quaintly entitled Great Mop. There she took rooms with a cottager and began to live her own life. Then her nephew Titus blundered after her and quartered himself in the village for an indefinite holiday. And Laura realized what she had escaped from, the family in which she had been submerged and suffocated. It was the last straw, and she ran into the woods and cried out for help. Toward the end of the book the author attains a modicum of detachment and describes successfully some of the more usual relations between husband and wife. WARREN, LOUIS AUSTIN. Lincoln's parentage & childhood; a history of the Kentucky Lincolns supported by documentary evidence. 392p $3.50 Century

B or 92 Lincoln, Abraham. Lincoln family 26-16624

From investigations among court records in twenty-seven Kentucky counties, the author has disclosed a wealth of documentary evidence bearing on the Lincoln and Hanks families which has enabled him to build up Lincoln's Kentucky background and many facts about his ancestry, childhood and home influences. Marriage papers, deeds, wills, tax books, and equity findings have yielded many entries, and among them all, the author asserts, he has not found one which is detrimental to the reputation of Abraham Lincoln's father.

"Through the co-operation of some 800 teachers scattered through thirty-four cities in various parts of the United States it has been possible to find out what books are read and liked by 36,750 children. We know the age and exact degree of reading ability of each of these children, and we know how well they liked each book they read, and we have some inkling as to why they liked it. On the basis of these data this graded book list has been prepared. It contains about 700 books on which 25 or more children's judgments were received, and which are probably suitable for children. The list is graded, not according to the actual school grade of the children, but according to the grade to which their reading ability corresponds."—Preface

WASSERMANN, JACOB. Oberlin's three stages; tr. by Allen W. Porterfield. 350p $2.50 Harcourt

26-9748

Introduced by a short mystical tale, The unknown guest, which in the mind of the author is a "bridge" to the longer story that follows, "Oberlin's three stages," is a psychological study, minute and delicate, of the growing consciousness of a seventeen-year-old boy and the stages by which he reaches independent thought and being. First there is traced the influence of a teacher, a man of unusual gifts, between whom and Oberlin the relation is as master and loved disciple. In the next stage Oberlin is beginning to be conscious of and disturbed by women, including his mother. The third stage is marked by his love for two sisters. Another short story, Sturreganz, completes the book.

Booklist 23:85 N '26

"His people often seem less like characters than cases, specific examples of type reactions. . . But against this he opposes his marvelous gift as a story-teller. "The reader who aims 'to understand' novels 'completely' will not read Herr Wassermann with much patience. He is a groper, as Sherwood Anderson is. "The neurotic, supra-sensuous Oberlin is a typical Wassermann hero, another Christian Wahnschaffe. To at least one faithful reader of every translated work of Wassermann, the publication in translation of 'Oberlin's Three Stages,' is good news. The latest translated novel has not the epic proportions of 'The World's Illusion'; neither has it the intense concentration of 'Gold' or 'The Goose Man,' but it is authentic Wassermann—the Wassermann who writes an enchanting tale and the Wassermann who impregnates that enchanting tale with the meanings of a humanitarian observer of the world. . . Grandpa Price decides to leave the Big house to his little granddaughter and favorite, Victoria. His outraged sons and their wives immediately plan to get it away from her, a difficult thing to do as the old man does not die at once leaving the child in possession. As the years pass, adding grace and wit to Victoria's candor, she becomes engaged to one of the rival cousins. Then by an underhanded stroke the family deprive her of the Big house. Victoria, however, not at all ill naturedly but quite effectively turns the tables on them, for she alone inherits in character all that the old family mansion stands for.

"Ernest Bradlee Watson has taken up the story of the English stage where Alwin Thaler left off in his earlier volume, Shakespeare to Sheridan, and carried it on to the very outposts of the present period. As Professor George Pierce Baker points out in his foreword, 'Knowledge of English drama from 1800 to 1900 has been much like our knowledge of central Africa in the seventies of the nineteenth century. Then maps showed the coasts of Africa well charted, but an interior conjectural or wholly unguessed.' Professor Watson has performed the work of mapping the interior as well as remapping the frontiers. In the book one can watch the growth of realism, see how standards in production and acting changed from the Kembles until the younger Kean and Fechter, follow the work of all the more important managers such as Kean, Elliston, Vestris, or the Bancrofts."—Theatre Arts Mo

"It contains little, if anything, that is absolutely new, nor is there much that is fresh or revelatory in the theory which it proposes, but it is an uncommonly well written, scholarly and comprehensive bit of literary compilation. The story of a little group of American missionaries in Japan is a rather grim picture of the jealousies, futilities and boredom of the life of the missionary compound, cut off from any real sympathy with the native people. Most zealous of all and uncompromising in his piety is the Reverend Alurid Wilberforce. His son Gilson whose whole life, except for a few years in America, has been spent in Kurodani, comes to understand the Japanese thru his love for the beautiful O-Yo-Ake-San, and it is mainly thru his eyes that Japan is pictured.

"Mr. Weaver's first novel shows the fact that he has had a long apprenticeship at the art of writing. It has few of the faults that an essayist, biographer, and professor might

WEBB, BEATRICE (POTTER) (MRS SIDNEY WEBB). My apprenticeship. 442p il $6 (21s) Longmans

B or 92 Labor and laboring classes—Great Britain 26-7130

Beatrice Webb's autobiography of the first thirty-four years of her life is largely a record of her intellectual growth and ambitions. One of the nine gifted daughters of an English capitalist she had the privilege of a happy and stimulating home life, an unconventional education and unusual social opportunities, all of which contributed to her training in the art of social investigator. She served her first apprenticeship under Charles Booth, collaborating in his investigations of the life and labor of London. Her next enterprise was a study of the co-operative movement, which led her to the discovery that she was a socialist. Her meeting with Sidney Webb transformed an apprenticeship into a partnership and a most fruitful working comradeship. The book is based on extracts from her diary which she has kept up from the time she was fifteen.

"It is doubly interesting because of the direct charm of the style and the quiet revelation of the inner moods and mental and spiritual growth of a young English woman during a particularly formative period of Britain's history."

"Let none admire that gold is found in hell,
Such soil may best afford the precious bane."

Milton

This quotation from the title page gives the key to this novel of strange and somber beauty. Gideon Sarn took his dead father's sins upon himself and sold his soul to the devil. The farm passed into his hands, and the lust for wealth possessed him. He drove his mother and his sister like slaves to wrest gold and yet more gold from the soil. Out of his dark and unhappy nature sprang his own nemesis. The story is not, however, unmitigated tragedy. For Gideon's sister Prue, who relates it in the rich dialect of Shropshire, tells of her own beautiful love for the weaver. And that story has a happy ending.

Heretofore there have been essays on Symons the poet and Symons the critic, but Mr. Welby's thesis is based on the premise that the poet and critic must be considered together if the whole man is to be revealed. . . WELLS, CAROLYN (MRS HADWIN HOUGHTON). Bronze hand. 319p $2 Lippincott

Oscar Cox, bachelor and multi-millionaire, was murdered at sea, killed by a curio of his own, a heavy, clutching, bronze hand. There was nothing to point to the murderer. A quiet search of the dead man's effects yielded nothing of importance—a few letters, one revealing the surprising fact that Cox was married, and a list of expensive jewels obviously bought for his wife. There was no clue there. No clue, that is, until the cases for the missing jewels were found in Miss Forman's cabin. This aloof and lovely young woman had already excited voluble comment, admiring or resentful, according to the sex of the speaker, and so suspicion, diverted from Cox's inscrutable valet, quickly centered upon her. It was a trying time for Max Trent, the girl's lover, but with the help of Fleming Stone, the famous detective, the mystery was solved and the criminal apprehended.

"Fleming Stone, the super-detective, is beginning to wear out his welcome or else Miss Wells's invention is growing a trifle threadbare. In 'The Bronze Hand,' which is Miss Wells's latest addition to the world's sleuth literature, Fleming Stone proves himself rather a bore." Carty Rank

WELLS, CAROLYN (MRS HADWIN HOUGHTON). Red-haired girl; a Fleming Stone story. 318p $2 Lippincott

26-21899

Returning home unannounced to demand an increased share of the family estate, Lloyd Converse finds his brother dead, killed in his own room. A wet footprint on the bathmat, a missing pair of flatirons, and a red haired girl seen by a policeman to leave the house on the night of Lloyd's return are insufficient evidence to prevent his arrest, especially since his money difficulties are known. But when Fleming Stone sets his master mind to work on these clues they are enough to free the innocent man and indict the guilty.

WELLS, HERBERT GEORGE. World of William Clissold; a novel at a new angle. 2v 362;363-797p $5 Doran 26-17245

The autobiography of William Clissold—his adventures, of body, soul and intelligence, in life—form the framework on which is hung this vision of the modern world from the liberal point of view. The story proper is only a vehicle. A few pages of direct narrative alternate with whole chapters of discussion in which Clissold analyzes his views about the universe, religion, history, economics, politics, love and sex—the ideas which occupy his thoughts and determine his acts. This William Clissold was born in 1865 so that his discussions cover most of the things that have happened in the world and the ideas that have occupied men's minds from that date to this, many important contemporary figures being introduced under their own names.

The author bases his friendly and interesting volume on "an acquaintance of some thirty years with the land and its people." He discusses the more or less familiar aspects of Japanese life, describes some parts of the country that are less well known, and devotes the concluding chapters to modern Japan and particularly to the work of the new Japanese woman.

"Mr. Walter Weston gives us an attractive and topical travel book on Japan. Questions such as 'Are the Japanese honest?' are discriminatingly dealt with. 'Some movements in Modern Japan' is also of absorbing interest: it was only in 1925, apparently, that universal manhood suffrage was inaugurated in Japan. 'Woman and her Ways' is another remarkable chapter."

973 United States—Politics and government. United States—History—Philosophy. United States—Civilization 25-28179

"This book consists of a series of lectures delivered in the month of April, 1925, at the University of North Carolina under the auspices of the Well Foundation, an unendowed lectureship on American Citizenship established by the University during the years 1914-1915. The thesis of the book is that our country has passed through three major political cycles, The Revolutionary Cycle, The Anti-Slavery Cycle, and the Populist Cycle; each cycle more or less duplicating the other and somewhat growing out of the other, and all three cycles being a part of a larger cycle of democratic growth in the peoples and governments controlled by the English speaking races. The thesis also would demonstrate that even those larger tribal cycles are a part of a still greater cycle of development known rather loosely as Christian civilization."—Preface

Bill could hardly refuse Mrs Rowland's request, yet the prospect of a summer as guide and guardian to her niece, a fastidious and high-strung girl from the East, aroused in the cowboy no enthusiasm whatever. He had enough on his hands already in a feud with Kyler over the continued cattle rustling, and over the more personal matter of the killing of one of Kyler's hired gunmen. He did not want an irritating girl to look after. Bill found Miss Rowland's temper even worse than he feared, and Kyler proved to be the perfect mischief maker. Between the two the cowboy's summer was a lively one, but it seemed to be worth the trouble, after all.

504 Science—Addresses, essays, lectures. Philosophy 25-21832

In the main a series of Lowell Institute lectures delivered in February, 1925, the book embodies a "study of some aspects of Western culture during the past three centuries, in so far as they have been influenced by the development of science." Professor Whitehead analyzes the reactions of science in forming the background of thought of successive generations, studying in particular the influences at work in the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Chapters on relativity and on the quantum theory are included, and one on religion and science.

This is a story of youth and youth's way of meeting its problems today. Sibyl Burnham is happily married to Charles Logan and little Nonny is almost four years old when trouble descends upon them. Charles in a moment of madness in war days had married an army nurse. His feeling for her passed and he believed himself free of her when her name was found on the casualty list of a bombed hospital. Six years afterward she turns up, an adventuress determined to make trouble for her husband. Sibyl faces her trouble gallantly, determined that it shall not wreck her life or Nonny's. Most of the book is concerned with the new life she makes for herself and Nonny in New York and the story ends on a note as happy as its beginning.

The autobiography of the ex-Kaiser covers the period of his youth only, from his earliest distinct recollections—memories of his childhood and his parents, of his long and rigorous schooling for the imperial throne, of the old emperor, his grandfather, of his regimental life, visits to England in the eighties, diplomacy and sport in Russia, and the ninety-nine days' reign of his father.

After inviting himself on this hunting trip in the Maine woods, he had picked a quarrel with each one of the group, men and women alike, being particularly insulting to the unfortunate girl still in love with him, and to his host whose twin sister he had married and divorced. On the first night in camp the fat man was shot. Since everyone there had a grievance against him each of the group was technically under suspicion. A competent old woodsman who was acting as guide took the investigation into his own hands and discovered the murderer.

WILLIAMS, T. G. History of commerce. 333p $1.50 (5s) Pitman

380 Commerce—History

The volume sets forth in moderate compass the commercial activities of all the nations that have developed an organized trade, from the earliest times to today. Beginning with a statement of the geographic and climatic basis of commerce the book reviews briefly the commercial peoples of antiquity and more fully the trade of the Middle ages and the struggle for commercial empire up to the age of mechanical invention. The development of the new commercial system is sketched, the changes in the organization of banking and credit and the reaction against free trade.

331.015 Labor and laboring classes—United States. Psychology, Industrial 26-1163

From his experiences as a laborer in steel plants, coal mines, shipyards and round-houses, Mr Williams studies the human factors which enter into the psychology of the worker and control the mainspring of his actions. Among these imponderables the author reckons the laborer's sense of the status of his work and his satisfaction and security in it, the comfort or discomfort of the job, the appreciation and recognition of the value of his work and the feeling of cooperation between employer and employed. The book is full of illustrations from cases that have come into the author's experience.

WILTSHIRE, MARY. Lesser breed. 266p $2
Dodd

One in each generation of Seagrays inherits the alcoholic taint in the yeoman blood. James Seagry has it, and tho he fights it fiercely, loses round after round. The outcome of one particularly bad drinking bout is an illegitimate child in the slums, a weakling son at home, and a wife invalidated for the rest of her days. On Elizabeth, James Seagry's passionately loved daughter, falls most of the burden of his sins. She looks after Walter until he grows up, and learning about her half sister in the slums, quietly provides for her too out of the slender returns from the farm. Liz, the half sister, has inherited the sturdy Seagry qualities and these survive in the midst of unspeakable squalor and evil. She adores Elizabeth for her kindness, and tho of lesser breed, when the opportunity comes, she sacrifices herself to make Elizabeth's happiness secure.

WOODWARD, HELEN. Through many windows. 387p $2.50 Harper
B or 92

This record of a modern business woman's life is a rarely candid piece of autobiography. Without training or influence Mrs Woodward fought her way over many obstacles to a commanding place in the advertising field and she writes with perfect frankness of her experiences along the way. She lays down no rules for success, for she herself broke all rules and ignored the conventions of the game, winning her way by courage and determination combined with a genius for writing advertising copy.

"It is a readable book. The author's long apprenticeship to advertising has taught her to write, to use the one right word for several inexact ones, to keep her story brisk and vivid. Her comments on life, people and business are shrewd and unabashed. The book has the interest of any faithfully told story of the struggle with life." E. E. Calkins

WOODWARD, WILLIAM E. George Washington; the image and the man. 460p il $4 Boni & Liveright

B or 92 Washington, George 26-21134

"This new appraisal of the character of Washington is of the type with which we have now become familiar, but it is not iconoclasm and it does contribute much to a better understanding of the man. It is impossible to write Washington's biography, Mr. Woodward says, without writing history, 'not because he made history, but because history, in its making, made him.' We have, therefore, much of the historic background of the age; 'at times he is all background,' the author says—and in depicting this he follows the now generally accepted views as to causes and events. The vital part of the book is the character of Washington as related to the environment and in itself."—Books (N Y Herald Tribune)

"Mr. Woodward's book is not a mere idol-smasher of the vulgar sort. It is a genuine effort at interpretation and, in a high degree, a successful one. The narrative moves easily and rapidly, clothed in a somewhat journalistic and staccato style, and the volume will undoubtedly have a big sale and prove popular. There are a number of minor errors but none of much importance." J. T. Adams

+ Books (N Y Herald Tribune) p1 O 10 '26 1650w

"Those to whom Washington is a minor—or a major—god will curse Mr. Woodward for his defamatory portrait. But gods have neither blood, nor brains, nor soul. Woodward's Washington has all three. But Mr. Woodward has his own prejudices too. It is his own Washington he has drawn, a new Washington for whom he has perhaps too little respect. Perhaps he made him too human, after all." K. "Although Hughes presents Washington in greater detail that does Woodward, his figure is no clearer because of the pains. Woodward surpasses Hughes in everything save lavishness of material. "Mr. Woodward's Washington is a modern captain of industry in the making—unimaginative, eternally pessimistic, a little grasping, honest but hard in business dealings, dynamic, cunning in trade, a little snobbish, contemptuous of the common and courteous to the sacred herd. It is really a painting made from the homely tin-type of the 'Diaries,' and done with fidelity. "Mr. Woodward's volume is not biography. Neither is it history. It is an amplified essay. We are not made to see the man Washington standing on his own feet, advancing from stage to stage of experience, unfolding his character as he proceeds. Instead we have a craftily arranged topical essay unfolding step by step the reactions of a sharply partisan essayist to the record of Washington's career. His most curious unfairness to Washington joined with his most flagrant misuse of the historical setting occurs in the Constitutional Convention. He conjures up an unreal situation and says 'that moment was the opportunity of Washington's life and he missed it.' Mr. Woodward is so fond of having Washington miss his opportunity." N. W. Stephenson

"Mr. Woodward's volume has two great merits. From it there does emerge, despite many careless, blurred, or sometimes even inaccurate strokes, a vivid and faithful impression of Washington as a living man. The other essential merit of the volume is its graphic, informative, and veracious sketches of colonial conditions, material, intellectual, and moral. . . Unfortunately, at the commencement of the Revolution, Washington the man begins to fade from the picture. . . As a biography, moreover, the book is rather badly proportioned." Allan Nevins

WOOLF, LEONARD SIDNEY. Village in the jungle. 301p $2.50 Harcourt

This is the first appearance in this country of a book written twelve years ago by Mr Woolf when he was in the Ceylon civil service. It is a haunting picture of the horror and desolation of the jungle and the life of its people, ruled like that of animals, first by fear, then by hunger and thirst. A little village of ten scattered houses, mean mud-huts, is the scene of a tale of passion, misery and crime.

"Let it be acknowledged at once that Mr. Leonard Woolf has written a most admirable book of jungle life in Ceylon, a book which can do nothing but enhance the literary reputation of the present editor of 'The Nation' and 'Athenaeum.' . . Every page of this book gives evidence of an intellect cognizant of the dark doom 'writ on ebony,' every sentence is an offering of obeisance to those powers of dark-

On the right-hand pages appear the authorized text; on left, the text as it was read to Coleridge in 1804, and later published. Voluminous notes afford an opportunity of studying the many changes and corrections made by the poet from the time of the original completion of the poem to the date of the first published text, all the known manuscripts having been examined. The book starts out seriously enough as a fitting sequel to Beau Geste, with a gallant French officer as hero and a cool American girl as heroine. Beau Sabreur justifies his name and saves the girl by hacking his way thru any number of ruffianly Arabs in an uprising at Zagui. Setting out next day on a perilous mission across the desert he takes Mary and her maid along for their safety. The little caravan is set upon by hostile Arabs and carried off to the Emir. At this point the story changes from comedy-drama to broad farce, with everyone enlightened but the hero, who upholds romantic tradition to the end.

"Where the story is military it is interesting, picturesque, convincing, but Captain Wren, in riding his shambling camel across the deserts, would do better to keep his hand on his rifle rather than his heart." B. L. Burman

WRIGHT, CHARLES HENRY CONRAD. Background of modern French literature. 329p il $2 Ginn

840.9 French literature—History and criticism. France—Intellectual life. France—Civilization. France—History—1789-1918 26-9757

Professor Wright sketches the background of French literature during the period from 1789 to 1914 to show how it explains that literature and how in turn the literary works of this period throw light upon contemporary history and social life. The book provides a guidebook for the better understanding of modern French writers and of the civilization to which they belong.

"All the topics have been treated with extraordinary breadth and completeness of view, and with a most striking richness of knowledge. Many literary quotations exemplify points of social history indicated, and there are 50-odd well-chosen illustrations, derived from contemporary books or caricatures."

WRIGHT, GENE. Yellow fingers. 332p $2 Lip-pincott

25-21262

Early in the story Nona Deering eludes the yellow fingers of Kwong Li, the Chinaman who was the indirect cause of her father's death, and believing that she has stabbed him to death, escapes from Bangkok on the trading ship Luak bound for one of the islands of the Malay archipelago. The master of the Luak, a hard Irishman known as "Brute" Shane, accepts the responsibility of looking after her and grows to enjoy it. Their romance prospers in its exotic setting, and despite the jealousy of little Saina, Shane's half-caste protégée, and the renewed efforts of Kwong Li who recovered his enmity with his health, the story ends happily in a castle in Ireland.

"There is a curious incoherency about the story. Mr. Wright may know his Malaysia and Siam as well as he does his alphabet. Picturing them for us is quite another matter."

919.69 Hawaiian islands

The author is an officer in the Air service and his book is mainly an account of an aerial journey over the entire group of islands, with occasional landings and a continuation of the journey by car and horse or by foot. Chapters of travel alternate with pages of history. A chapter on the religious development of the islands and one on Hawaiian industries are added, as well as a bibliography, vocabulary and statistical tables. The illustrations, sixty-three in number, are from photographs by the author.

"The author writes vividly, notwithstanding his custom of loitering along over details, and his accounts of airplane flights enable the reader to envisage each island as a whole in a way that makes something new in travel writing. So fascinating is this comprehensive view from the air, supplemented by subsequent exploration at the ground level, that devotees of travel books are likely to become dissatisfied with the old way and to demand that all their travels-by-proxy be made by airplane."

"Elinor Wylie is essentially a poet, and . . . her beloved Shelley is the hero of her story. Shelley rescued near dead from drowning off Leghorn by a Yankee clipper brig, and not unwillingly carried off to America (for he suspected that Mary no longer loved him); Shelley with his hearty rescuer, Davie Butternut, off for St. Louis where the vague ideal of an injured woman alone, beautiful, in peril, captured his fancy like an unwritten poem; Shelley drifting down the Ohio on a log raft with a philosopher and a mathematician; Shelley lifting his fine head proudly while the Indians prepared the torture; Shelley loved by mountain naïveté and by the desert passion of Anne, the adopted daughter of a tribe; Shelley in California troubled by the metaphysics of love and freedom—what an opportunity for a poet whose chiselled prose can render sophisticated fantasy, and can adapt the primitive and the barbarous (but never the bourgeois) with that ease of generalized portraiture which the eighteenth century knew so well!"—Sat R of Lit

As a romance, it is a new and piquant rendering of the American theme for sophisticated readers seeking, as they sought in the eighteenth century, for savour and ideas more than for story or verisimilitude. The keenest mind in Europe in a brute black body. This was Klaus Felde, son of an African soldier and a German woman of good blood. Crazy by the outrage, the mother's mind harbored but one thought—vengeance. She saw her son as agent of the vengeance of the Lord. As Klaus Felde grew in power he became the leader and yet the pawn of a group dedicated to a war more ghastly than the world has ever seen. These men who deferred to the brain of the white man in Felde shuddered from the body of the black. A lonely, tragic figure, urged to violence by his mother, he became a Samson of hate, longing to demolish the civilization which had mocked him. The story is fantastic, horrible, yet on the whole, strangely compelling.

"Like the other young writers of London society life, Miss York feels compelled to be sparkling and rather heavily naughty; like the others, too, she has had a touch of Arlen and been exposed to Huxley. It takes a few chapters to balance these two elements successfully, but eventually there emerges a pretty good tale of society and diplomatic intrigue, with plot and settings by Oppenheim, ladies by the obliging Mr. Arlen, conversation out of 'Epigrams, Risqué and Profound, for Adventures-

"One must not take 'Lavinia and the Devil' or Miss York too seriously. Internal evidence suggests that she is not satirizing post-war society so much as enjoying a little literary joke. She has endeavored not only to write an entertaining and slightly naughty story, but to ring the changes on a certain famous and well-established plot. She deliberately quotes from the source of her inspiration. Then seemingly, she said, 'Well, if a man in that story, why not a woman in mine?' And in answer she wrote not 'Miss Jekyll and Madame Hyde,' but 'Lavinia and the Devil.'"

YOUNG, EVERETT. Custody children. 340p $2.50 Holt

The book is an indictment of divorce in its effect upon the children. Clodi's mother and father were divorced. Her mother married again, was again divorced, and remarried Clodi's father. This quick and careless change of relationships set its mark upon the child, so that her own life, which had in it the promise of something better, followed the pattern of her mother's. She had three husbands in fairly rapid succession, each of them in love with her in his own way, tho only the first was a decent love, one that might have promised permanent happiness. Divorced from her third husband, Clodi tours the continent with a nineteen-year-old lover. Catastrophe follows this affair. For once shaken out of herself, Clodi makes the sole unselfish gesture of her life. She is a sorry figure, selfish and self-deceived, lacking the moral fibre to pull herself out of a degrading environment, or to overthrow the inherited tradition of easy divorce.

"'Custody Children' is both stimulant and depressing. Its candor is searching. At times Mr. Young loses his tight grasp on his narrative of such potent force. In the main, he carries off his involved narrative, with its vast ramifications—a changing society portrayed with all its follies and vanities—with a satisfactory realization. It was a big undertaking—a story full of pity and futility—a dolorous chronicle."

"Heaven Trees" is a picture of life on a Mississippi plantation seventy-five years ago. It is a spacious life filled with a confusion of kith and kin and their continual comings and goings. There is no plot to this gracious story. Uncle George Clay was the master of the rich estate of Heaven Trees and Aunt Martha, its efficient mistress, conducted it with a luxury and style which made it famous among the country houses thereabout. The book opens with the coming of a young kinswoman from Vermont and thruout the contrast is marked between the life she had left, with its reticence and economy, and the easy, luxurious life into which she was thrown.

+ Lit R p4 O 2 '26 680w

"Mr. Young is perpetually surprising with his precocious ability to characterize with a sentence or a paragraph. Indeed, his entire book is built around, if not upon, such characterizations. Not all of his personages are defined with the same degree of sharpness, and Ellen Stark is one of the more shadowy. This is unfortunate, for one has the impression that the author intended to make his contrast of the North with the South the effective feature of the narrative. As it is, and despite the thread of story which binds the whole together, the book lacks definiteness of purpose. . . 'Heaven Trees' is a book of carefully defined human shades, very quiet, almost placid and wholly ingratiating."

895 Chinese drama—History and criticism. Theater—China 25-23016

"The author traces the history of the Chinese drama from its uncertain beginnings in the dim mists of tradition down to the latest presentation by China's present idol, Mei Lan Fang."—Books (N Y Herald Tribune)

"In addition to the excellent qualities we have come to expect in any well made book, we have here four original paintings on silk depicting four of the principal type characters of the Chinese stage. These were done by the students of the Peking School of Fine Arts, and by their vivid colors convey an idea of the brilliant costuming of Chinese dramatic presentation, which it would have been difficult if not impossible to convey with color plates. The charm and flavor of these paintings pervade the whole volume." H: K. Norton

"Described interestingly and vividly." L. S. K. + Boston Transcript p6 D 19 '25 480w

"The book is rich in information, carefully collected, thoroughly digested and agreeably presented; and its richness is increased by its many photographs, which are not merely pretty pictures but really illustrations of the text. The volume is one which will be interesting and instructive to every one who cares for the drama." Brander Matthews

"There are inevitable gaps in it—gaps which Mr. Zucker hopes that he will inspire someone to fill. Yet it is both an informing and an amusing record, and certain circumstances combine to make Mr. Zucker's book one of distinct value for the American audience to which he has addressed it." "The only adverse criticism of the book which I might make is that, in reprinting certain articles previously published in magazines, and now employing them as chapters, he has given the reader a number of repetitions of fact. This, however, is a minor fault. The book is entertaining, it exhibits a scholarly understanding of theatre art in general, and above all, it dissipates the cloud of mystery which has hung so long about the Chinese theatre." "Mr. Zucker's volume is not highly technical. It is distinctly a volume for the student layman interested in the history and the material, the art and the conventions of the Chinese theatre." F: Morton

ZWILGMEYER, DIKKEN, Inger Johanne's live-ly doings; tr. from the Norwegian by Emilie Poulsen, 261p il $1.75 Lothrop

Inger Johanne was the very mischievous young daughter of a Norwegian judge. From one day to the next she was always up to her eyes in trouble, because no sooner had a piece of mischief popped into her head than she started out upon its immediate accomplishment. But Ingar Johanne was not bad at heart and so penitent did she become when she had hurt someone's feelings that she always came out of her difficulties a wiser, tho sometimes a sadder, little girl.

"Something of Norwegian life is revealed, but the story like its predecessor is most notable for its humor and simplicity."

"This book will please girls all the way up to 15 years, who will find Norway an extremely pleasant place to live in. A story like this, recording Johanne's pranks and escapades, helps the reader to visualize the country."
